and so we saw it, but my sonder, Mr. McConal, and he only as we were gathering on the stage.

Now as to the propriety of that resolution I think, and I am sure most men will agree with me, that it was well within the scope of the object of the meeting. The notice for a meeting "to allow the people to express their object of holding Hongkong" an opportunity of expressing its sorrow and indignation at the measures of British subjects at Kuching. Again I ask you to note the word "British." Indignation is anger, but it is something more it is anger excited by some act which touches the dignity, the honour, of the person giving expression to it. The anger excited by the measures of the British Government, or, if I may say, the measures of the British subjects, is anger directed against some one. It must have an object. In my opinion, and I am happy to say in the opinion of the vast majority of that crowded meeting, there was very indignation, because the murder of these hapless ladies and children touched our honour and our dignity as Englishmen and Englishwomen. The anger was stirred up not merely against the British Government, but also against those whose consciousness, folly, or neglect had rendered it possible that so many innocent lives should have been so suddenly and so barbarously taken and we were determined to give expression to that anger and indignation. I know that if I had not moved the resolution, there were gentlemen in the audience with motions in the same spirit, but I moved it, and perhaps a little stronger. We were indignant that British subjects should have been so helplessly slaughtered, and we held that the speech and indignation of the British Government in the past had led up to and been partly the cause of that terrible slaughter.

If I had moved that resolution of mine, I would have been equally angry, but it was stirred up not merely against the British Government, but also against those whose consciousness, folly, or neglect had rendered it possible that so many innocent lives should have been so suddenly and so barbarously taken and we were determined to give expression to that anger and indignation. I know that if I had not moved the resolution, there were gentlemen in the audience with motions in the same spirit, but I moved it, and perhaps a little stronger.

We were indignant that British subjects should have been so helplessly slaughtered, and we held that the speech and indignation of the British Government in the past had led up to and been partly the cause of that terrible slaughter.
